After years of perfecting the bonding process, Ulam established All-Clad Metalcrafters in 1967, and began producing professional quality bonded cookware for working chefs and avid home cooks. The brand flourished as early adopters realized the American-made steel — the same way it was four decades ago. It is still widely handcrafted in the USA.

History and Craftsmanship

Born in the U.S. steel age in 1967, Clad Metals began as a small metallurgical company that specialized in formulating bonded metals for a variety of industries. Company founder, John Ulam, realized the combination of different metals created composites that yielded superior results. He was awarded more than 50 U.S. patents and half dollars. He was later instrumental in the nation’s conversion from solid silver coins to bonded layered metals used in coins today.

Today, All-Clad cookware is still handmade in Canonsburg, Pennsylvania, with American-made steel — the same way it was four decades ago. It’s still widely sought after by the world’s top chefs and passionate home cooks.
